

Map 9 Britannia Inferior

Compiled by A.S. Esmonde-Cleary, 1996
with the assistance of R. Warner (Ireland)

Introduction

Any map of this part of Roman Britain is inevitably concerned with the shifting limits of Roman military control in the north. All study of Roman intervention in this area has been heavily biased in favor of military sites and their exploration. Thus its priorities, reflected by the map, are rather different from those set for research into the Roman presence further south in Britain. In addition, the relative scarcity of some types of site common further south (towns and villas especially) contributes to giving this map a very different aspect to Britannia Superior (Map 8), but an aspect that nonetheless reflects real and important contrasts.

So far as can be determined, there have been no significant changes between the Roman period and the present day in coastline or other physical topographic aspects, despite continuing post-glacial eustatic and isostatic adjustment of the relative levels of land and sea.

The map displays essentially three major episodes in the Roman occupation of northern Britain. The southern part is compiled on the same principles as Map 8. Thus the military sites shown are the long-lived garrison forts, the forts of Hadrian's Wall, and the "outpost" forts of the Wall in Northumberland and south-west Scotland. The fourth-century "signal stations" on the Yorkshire coast are likewise marked. There are also the few towns in the north, and the scatter of villas lying north of York. This part of the map is therefore directly comparable with, and a northern continuation of, its southern neighbor.

The part of the map covering Scotland reflects rather different criteria, particularly as regards site longevity. Much shorter-lived military sites are shown here, in part because of the intrinsic importance of the military campaigns which they represent. In part, too, their inclusion recognizes the labor which has been expended over the years in their location and excavation, and in the reconstruction of the successive phases of Roman failure to conquer Scotland. Two major phases of Roman incursion northwards can be seen. First, the Antonine Wall of the mid-second century A.D. and the forts held in the Lowlands at that time; second, to the north of the line of the later Antonine Wall, the aftermath of Agricola's campaigns in the 80s A.D. For the latter, the legionary fortress of Inchtuthil (ancient Victoria?) and the associated "glen-blocking" forts are shown; some of the Lowland forts, too, were first occupied at this time. None of the numerous "marching camps" (temporary campaign fortifications) known from Scotland, and linked with more or less certainty to various known Roman campaigns, has been shown. The Severan campaigns of the early third century are represented by the base at Carpow.

Even more than in the case of Map 8, the omission of native-style "farmsteads" gives a very "empty" look to much of the map. The reasons for this choice are explained in the Introduction to Map 8. The omission, however, by no means signifies that much of the area covered was uninhabited. On the contrary, the tribal names certify that it was. Equally notable is the paucity of sites beyond the frontiers. There is Roman material known from native sites in Scotland and Ireland, but for the most part it is potsherds and trinkets (for Ireland, see further the Introduction to Map 2). Again, the contrast in this respect with frontier regions elsewhere (the Danube lands, for example) is real and instructive.
